Earlier this week, at the World Ski School in Cranmore, I was fortunate enough to be in a group of seven women, and two men. Two folks were being mentored to become, skiers/snowboarders – one for the long ways up, and one for the long ways down. For the long ways down, our group was given the task of developing a weather safety plan, and being able to execute it. So, what does a weather safety plan look like? We learned a little bit about the “ten most likely weather related events” and how to plan, and then talked with a local guide about the Lake Tahoe area, with a focus on Mount Rose. After the discussion, we were able to complete our weather safety plan, the basics of which are as follows: Always have layers – a warm layer, a cold layer, and a layer for re-use. Keep a weather-proof pack with dry socks, a lighter, and rain gear. If we don’t know the weather, our intent is to move. If we DO know the weather, our intent is to stay safe (yes, even in the mountains!) Now, here’s where things get a little complicated. When we were given the task of developing a weather safety plan, and our group of seven was paired with two mentors, one who was an advanced skier/snowboarder, one who was a rookie, and one who I was paired with. As an advanced skier/snowboarder, she has “basics down”, and I was paired with her, because I was a rookie, and was definitely lacking in the basics. So, I was given some basic information, which I promptly ignored and did what she did – which is just what we were supposed to do. So, what happens? She steps forward as an advanced skier/snowboarder and can’t do anything, so I step in as a rookie and CAN do everything, so we switch off. I take over and, with the help of the snowboarder, I give her the basics. It doesn’t stop there

Its originality lies in the fact that it can work with almost any DAW, and any audio interface that uses the Firewire bus. It was designed by a musician that had enough fun with making music with the Volca series! It is already available on the KORG website, but we decided to release it on codecanyon for some budgeting to help its evolution. The Volca-IS has an interesting history. It was launched a few years ago as an affordable device for beginners. It featured a special interface (VST) designed to be easy to use. The original Volca came with virtual synths, 8 analog outputs and 2 high quality digital inputs. More or less, this is what is at the heart of the instrument. Nowadays, the Volca-IS can be bought as a standalone instrument, the “Volca-S”, with an expanded set of analog effects and the possibility to make presets to create you own effects, or from the Korg PS03-S which you can use to build your own. Unfortunately the factory presets were pulled out of this expansion in order to focus on the standalone kit. And that’s a real shame. You would love to have all the effects and synth included in the unit. The Virtual Audio Buffer is the perfect solution for this problem. It includes all the effects you expect from a Korg instrument (oscillators, filters, compressors, effects,...) with a Korg IS-7 interface, which has a virtually identical interface to the one used in the Volca-IS. All the interfaces work in real time, meaning that the DAW runs in real time, you don't have to stop the audio engine to add the effect. All the inputs are even send to the bus so the audio engine can continue running. In addition you can assign a different output to each D b7e8fdf5c8
